

Village in the City

Aerial View Render

Bridging Opposites

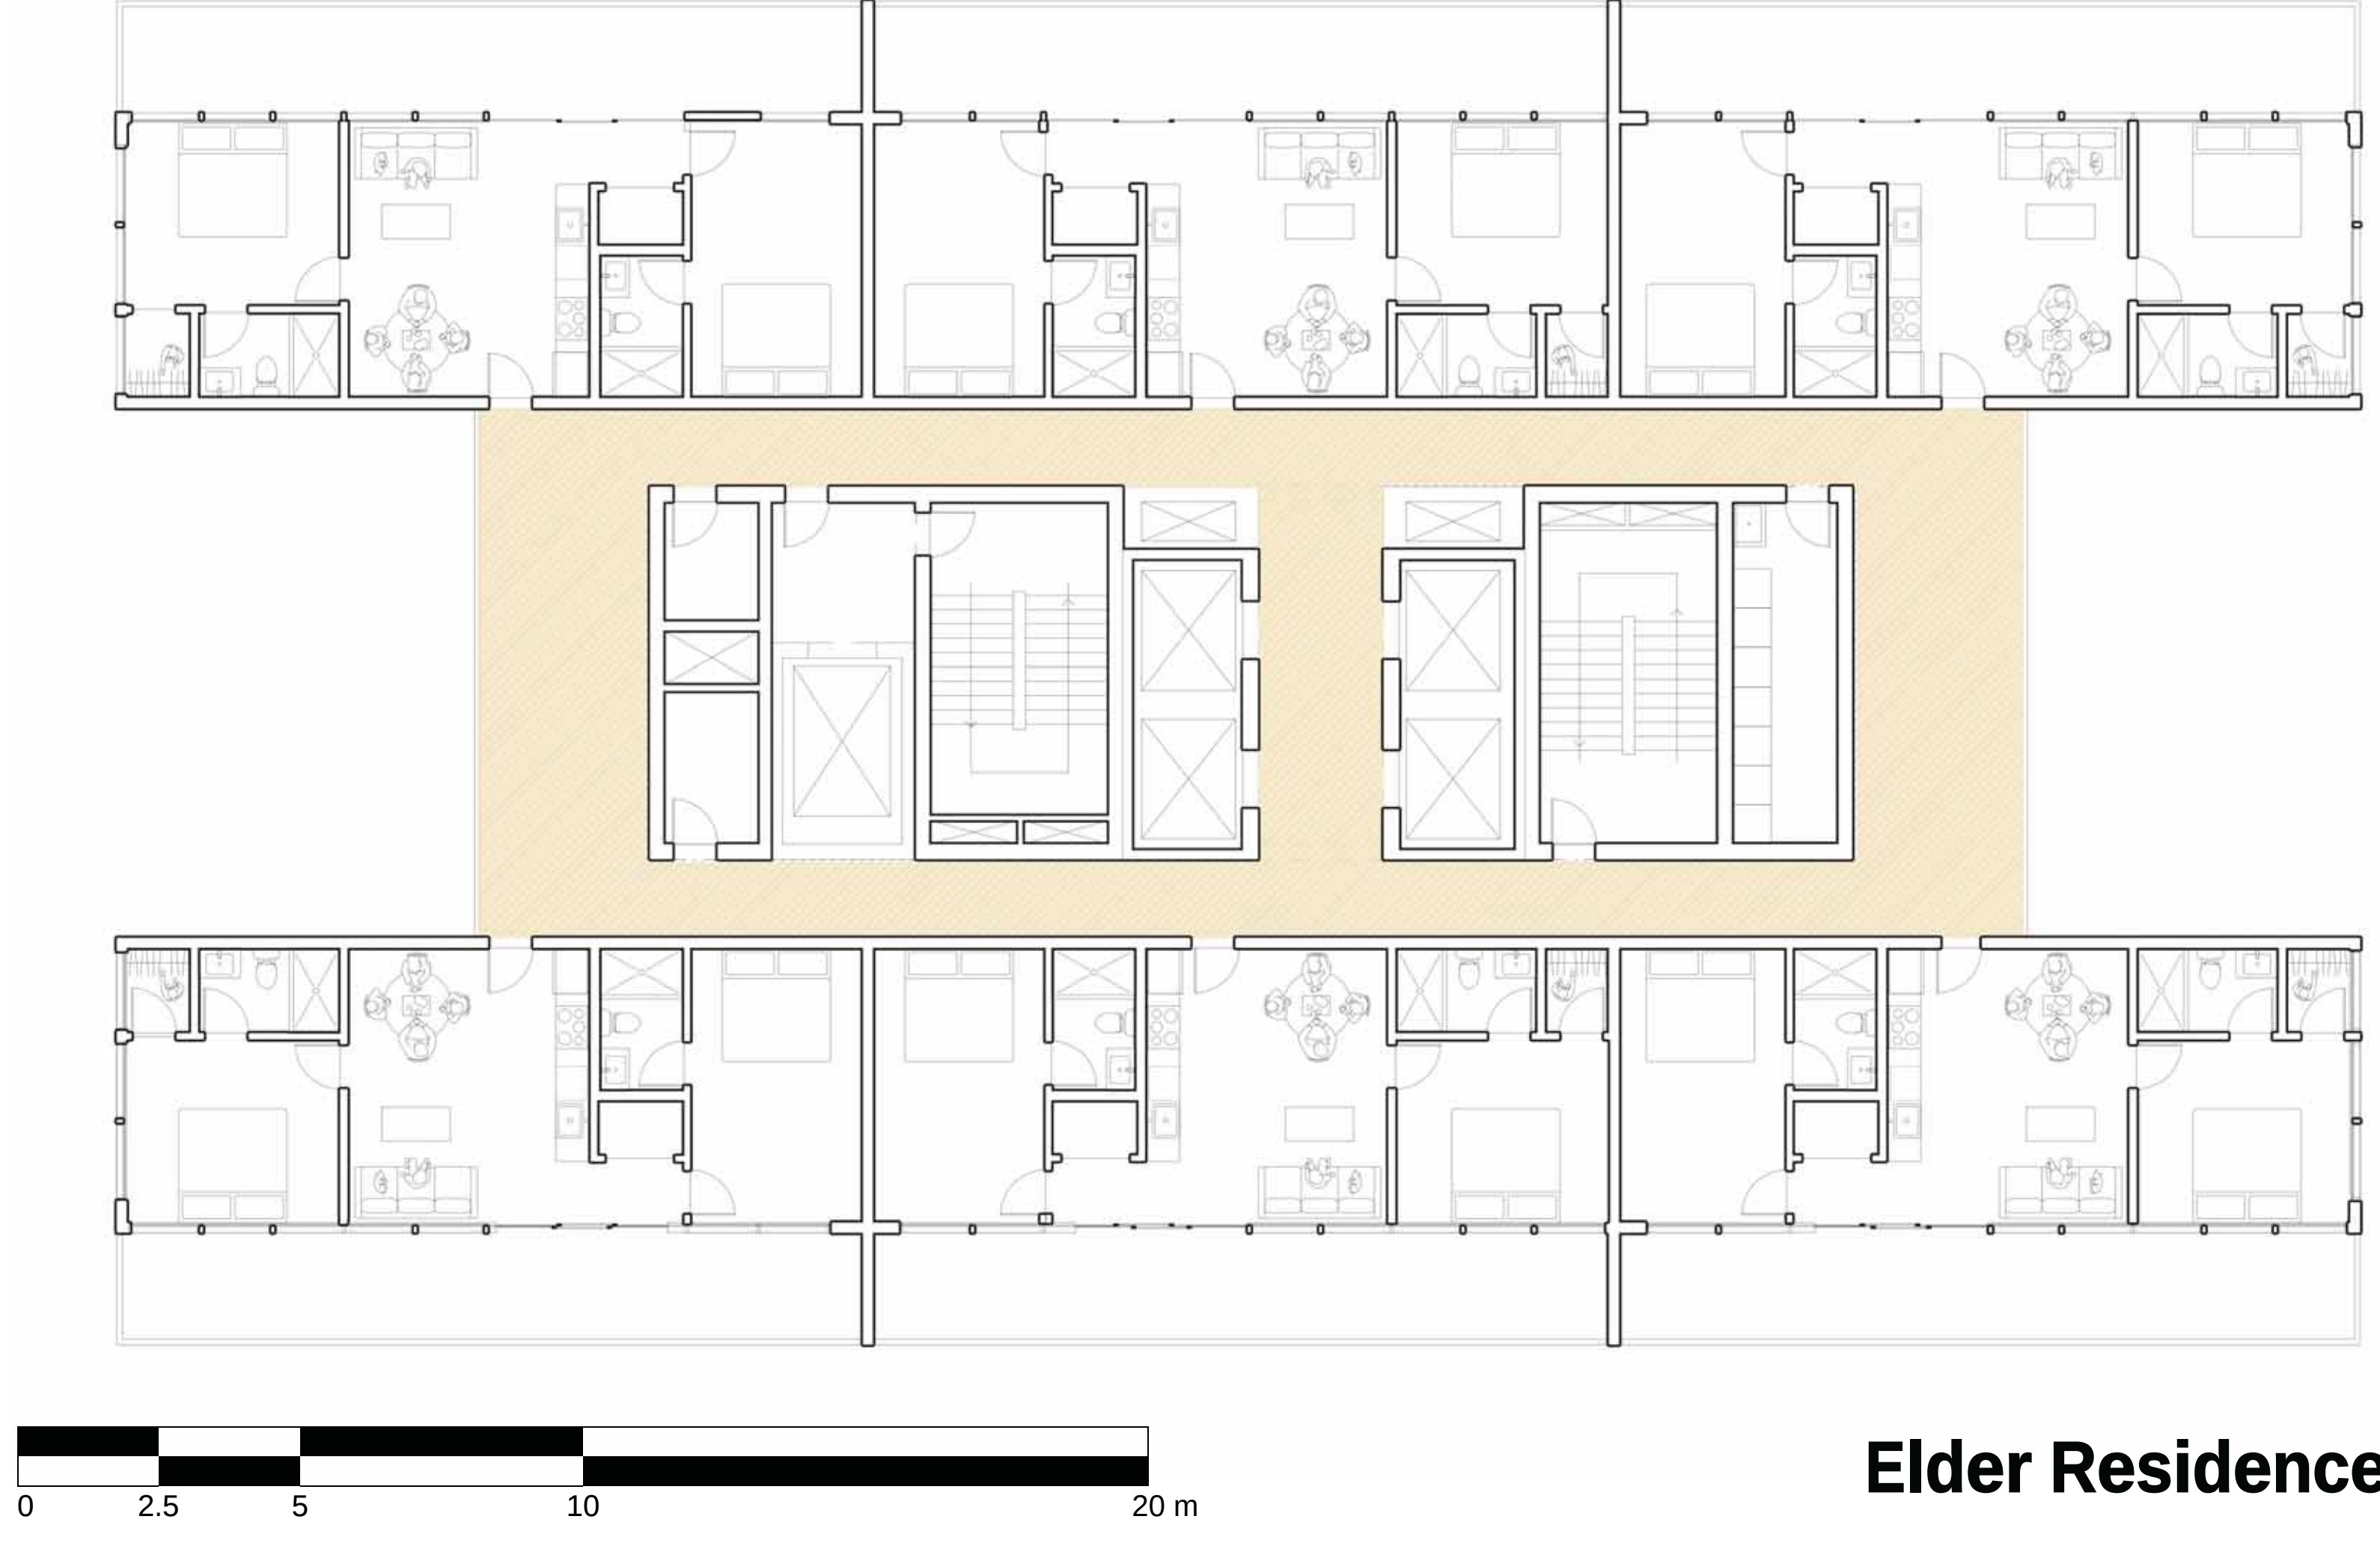

Across from the lush expanse of Lumpini Park, our architectural proposal responds to the contrasts that define Bangkok—urban and rural, modern and traditional, individual and collective. This project envisions a residential complex composed of three distinct yet interwoven towers, each dedicated to a core user group: elders, youth, and families. Together, these vertical communities form a cohesive yet diverse village in the sky.

The architectural language reflects a fusion of three inspirations. First, the solid rectangular towers express the formal and vertical intensity of Bangkok's built environment. Second, terraced planes that cascade down and wrap the towers evoke the layered landscapes of rural Thailand's rice paddies—softening the form and introducing a horizontal rhythm of nature and community. Third, these terraces are pixelated, referencing the modularity and vibrant individuality of Thailand's ubiquitous shop units. These pixel-like volumes stitch together communal terraces that operate not just as circulation or landscape, but as active social platforms—public in spirit, local in scale.

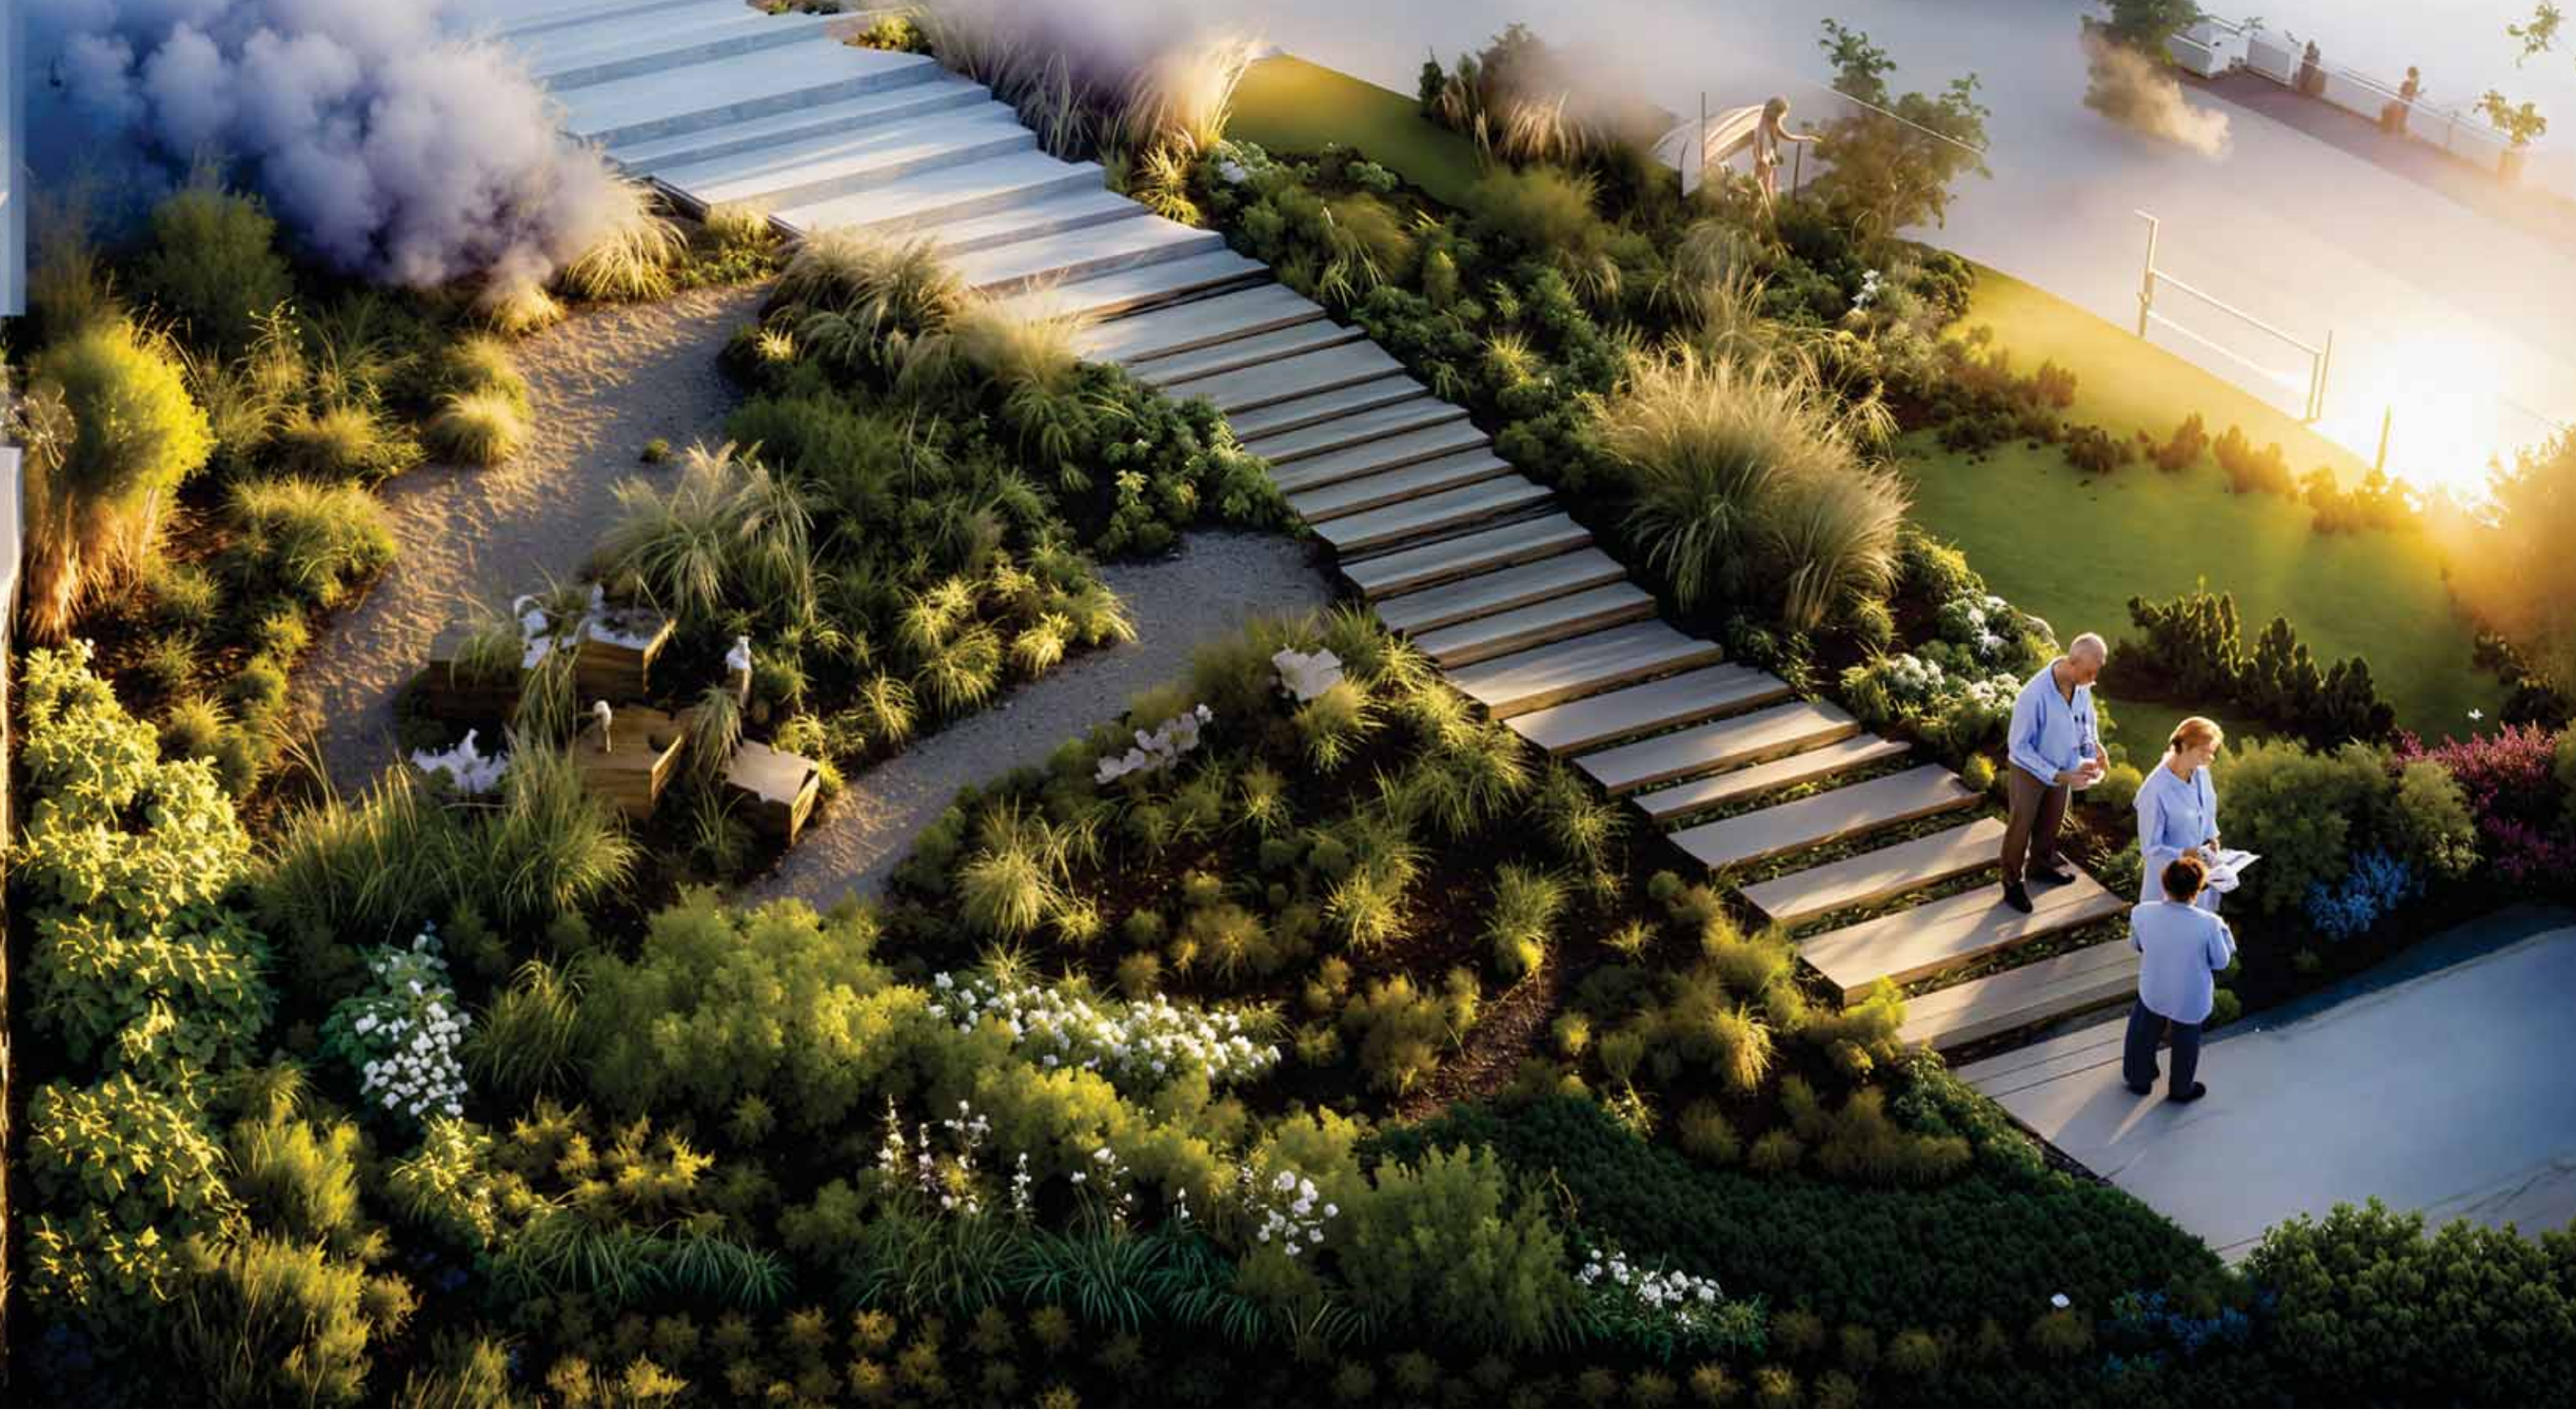

In merging the rectilinear clarity of towers with the fragmented intimacy of shop-inspired terraces, the design bridges opposites: nature and city, generations and lifestyles, solidity and porosity. The result is a vertical ecosystem that reinterprets Bangkok's urban fabric through the lens of tradition, community, and layered coexistence.

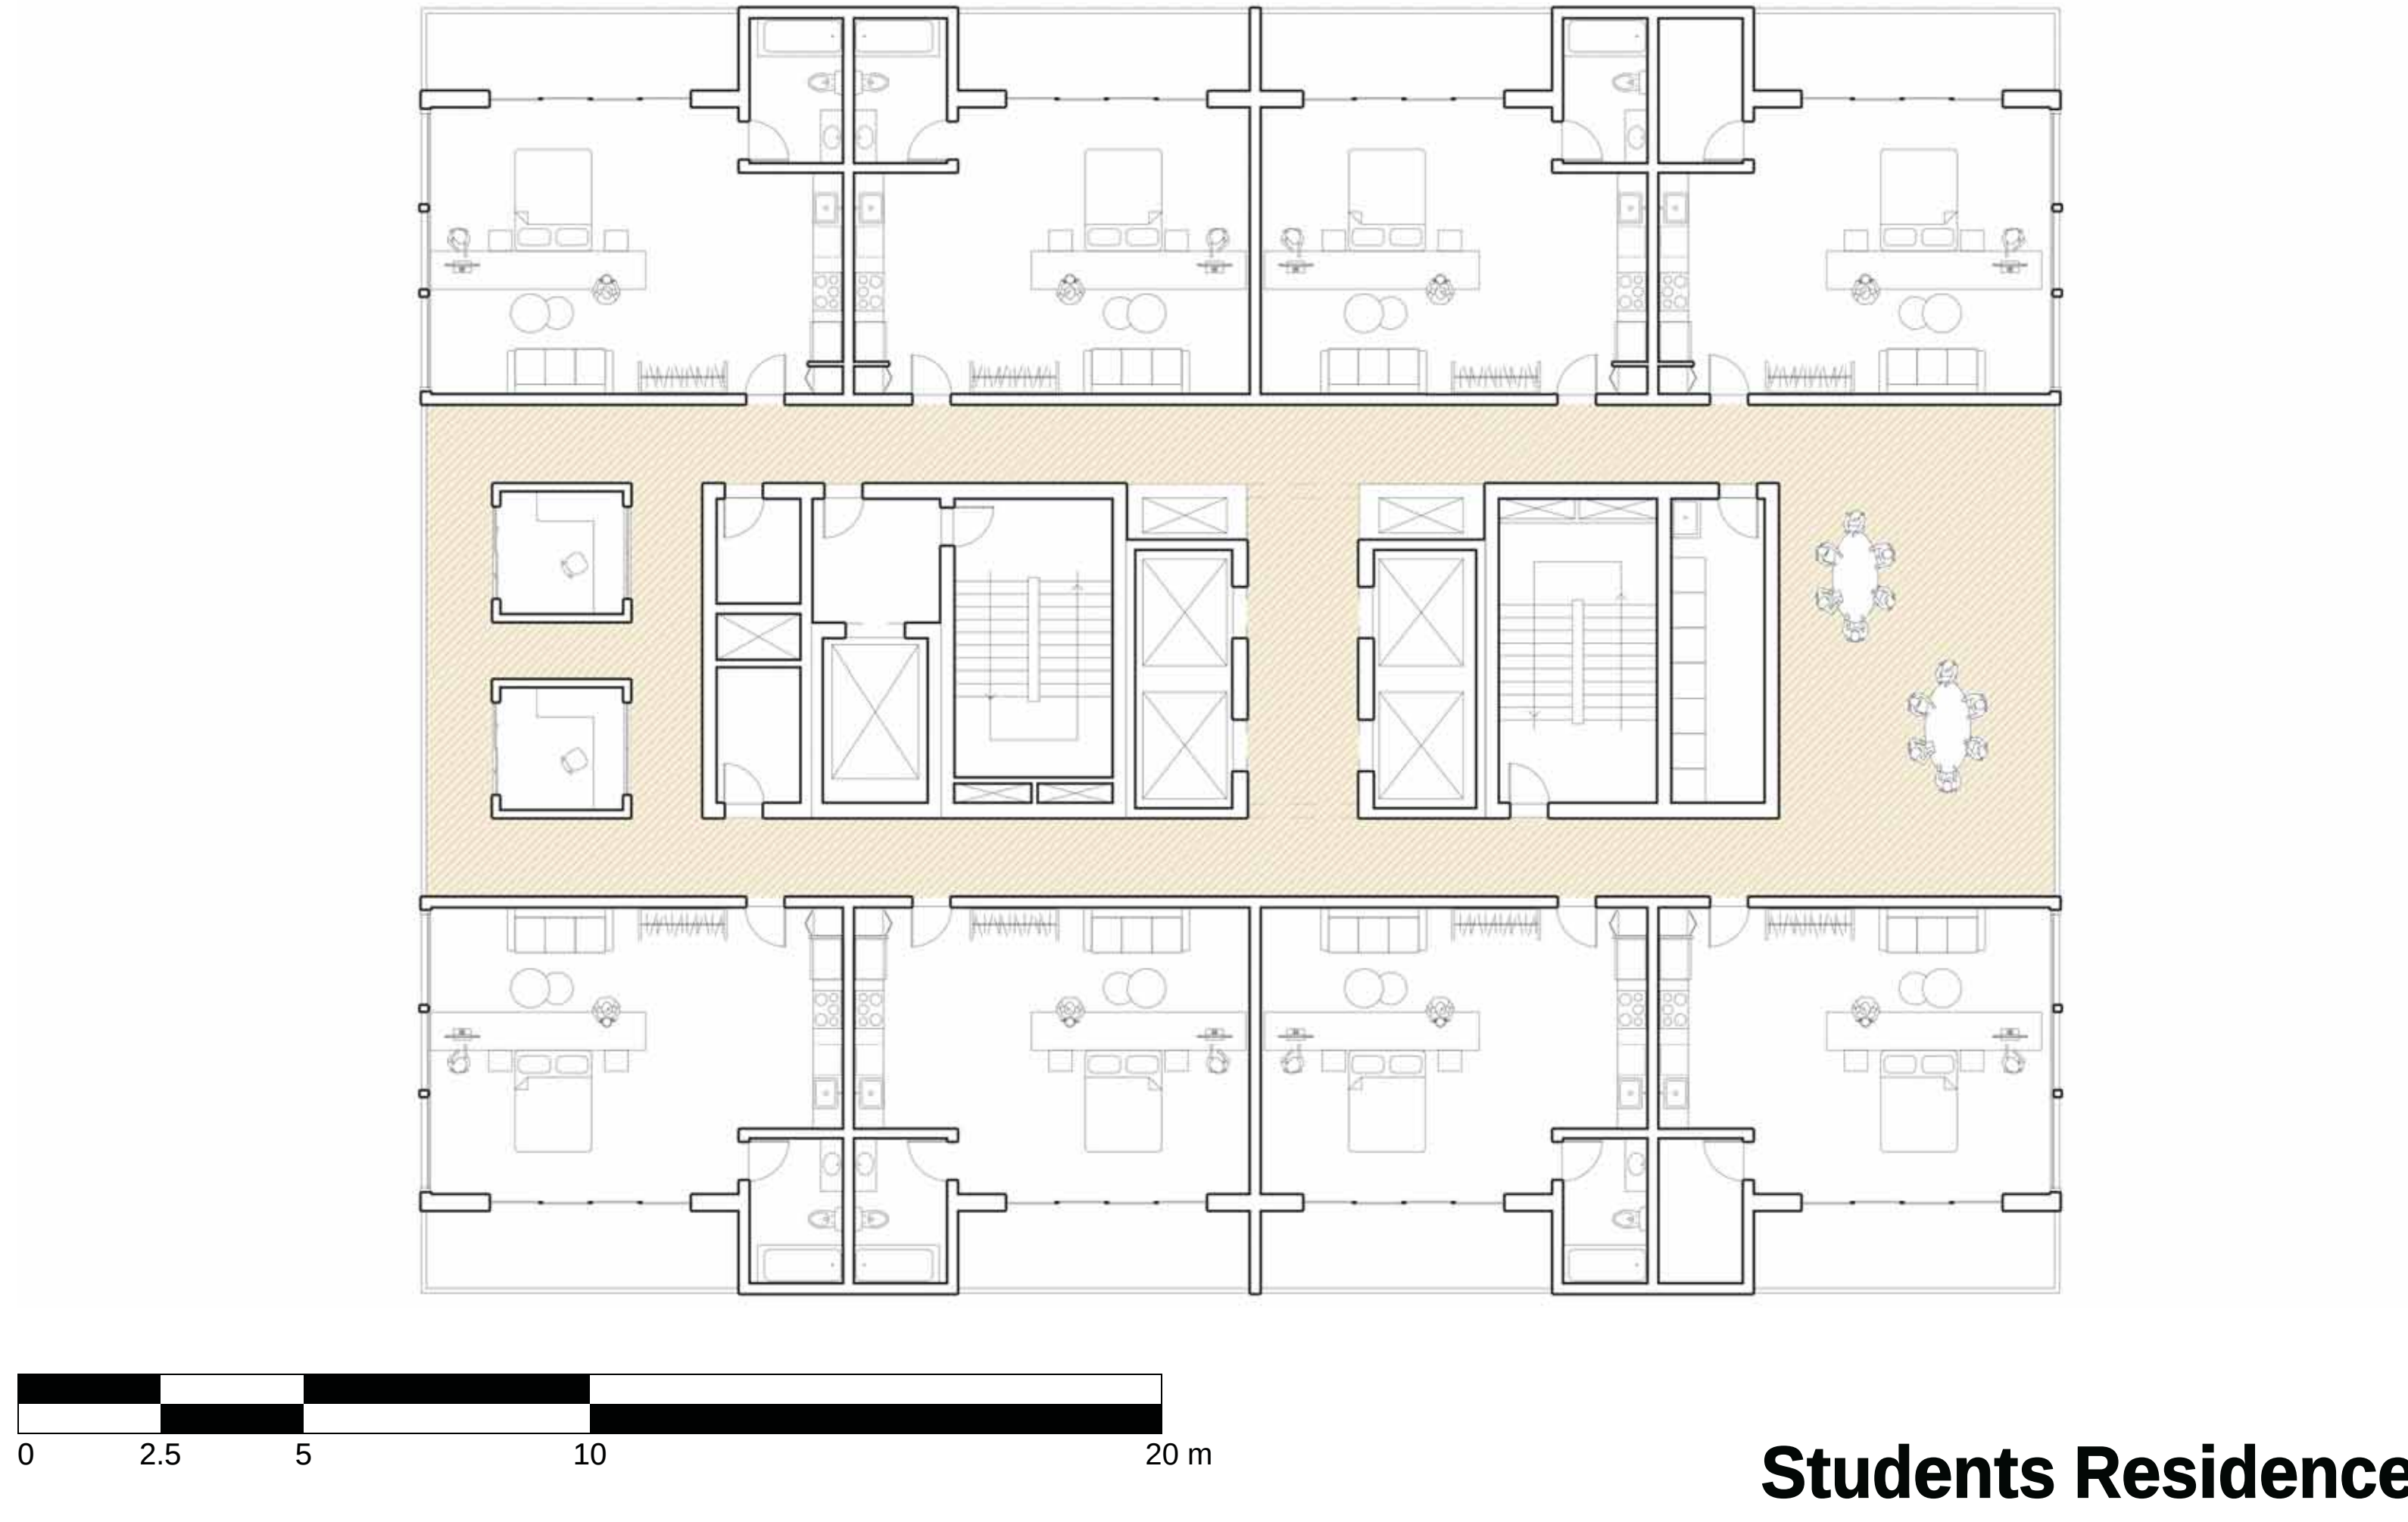

Terrace Landscape

Elder Residence

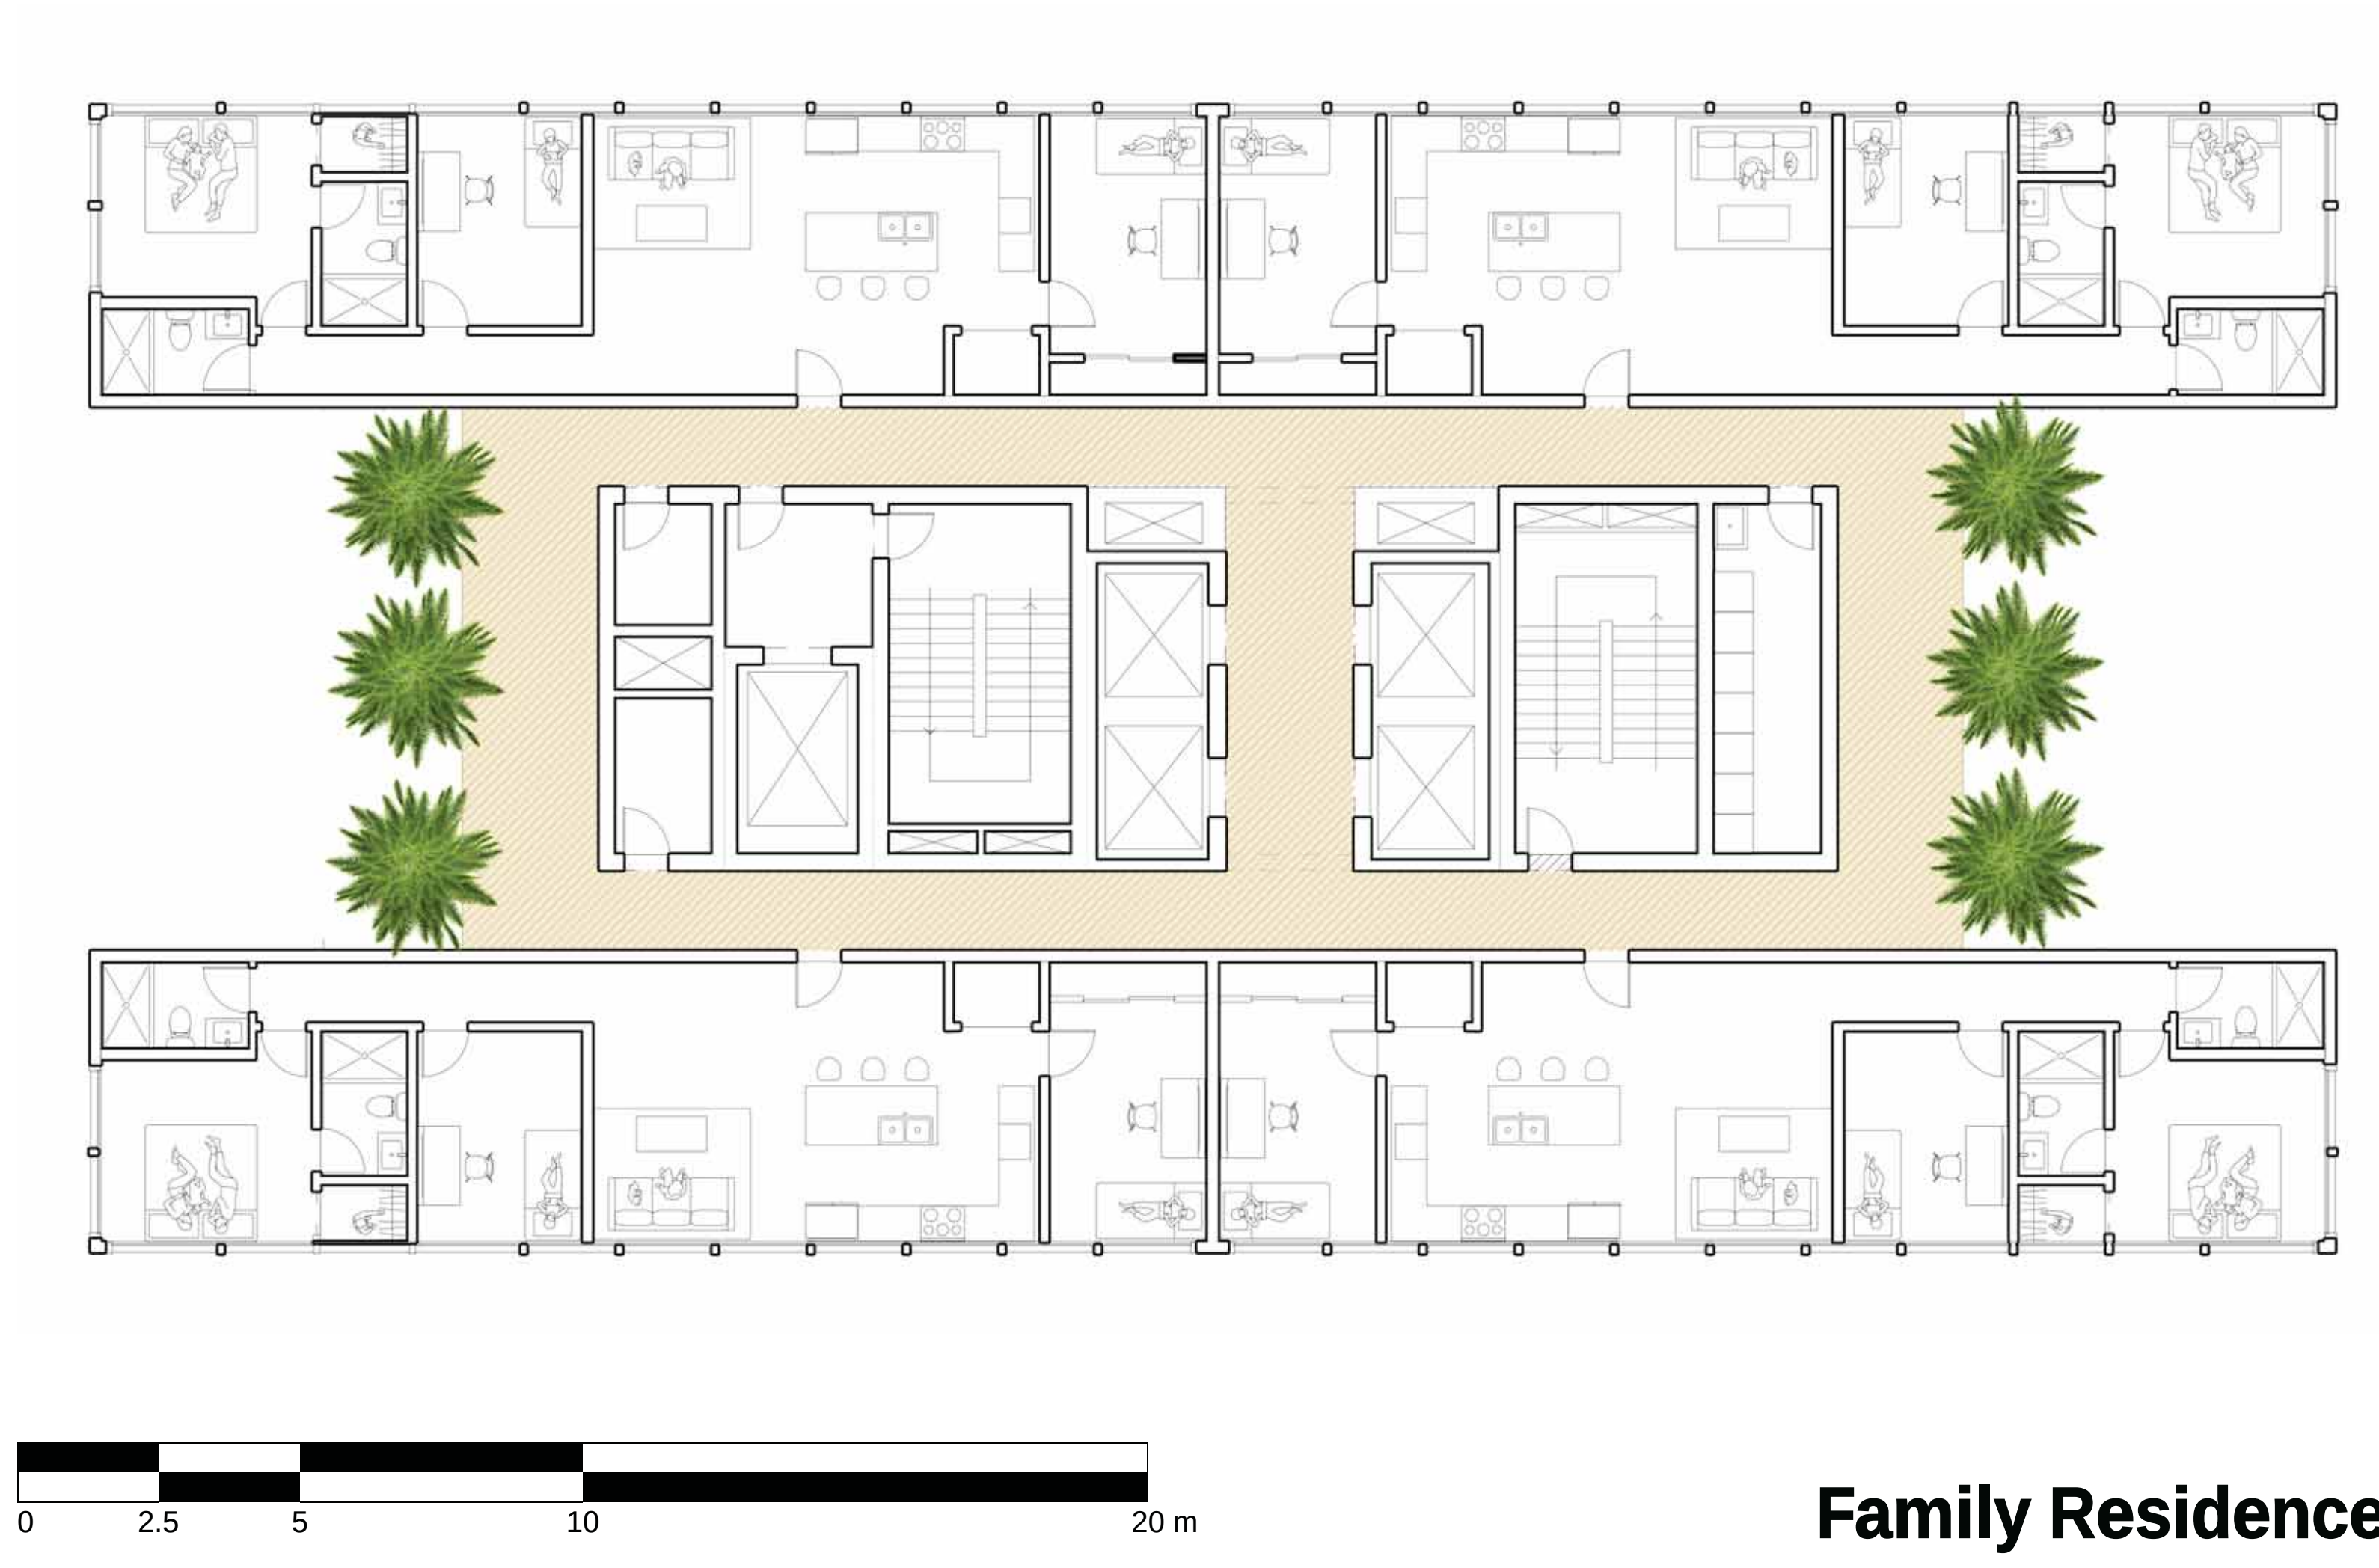

Terrace Landscape

Students Residence

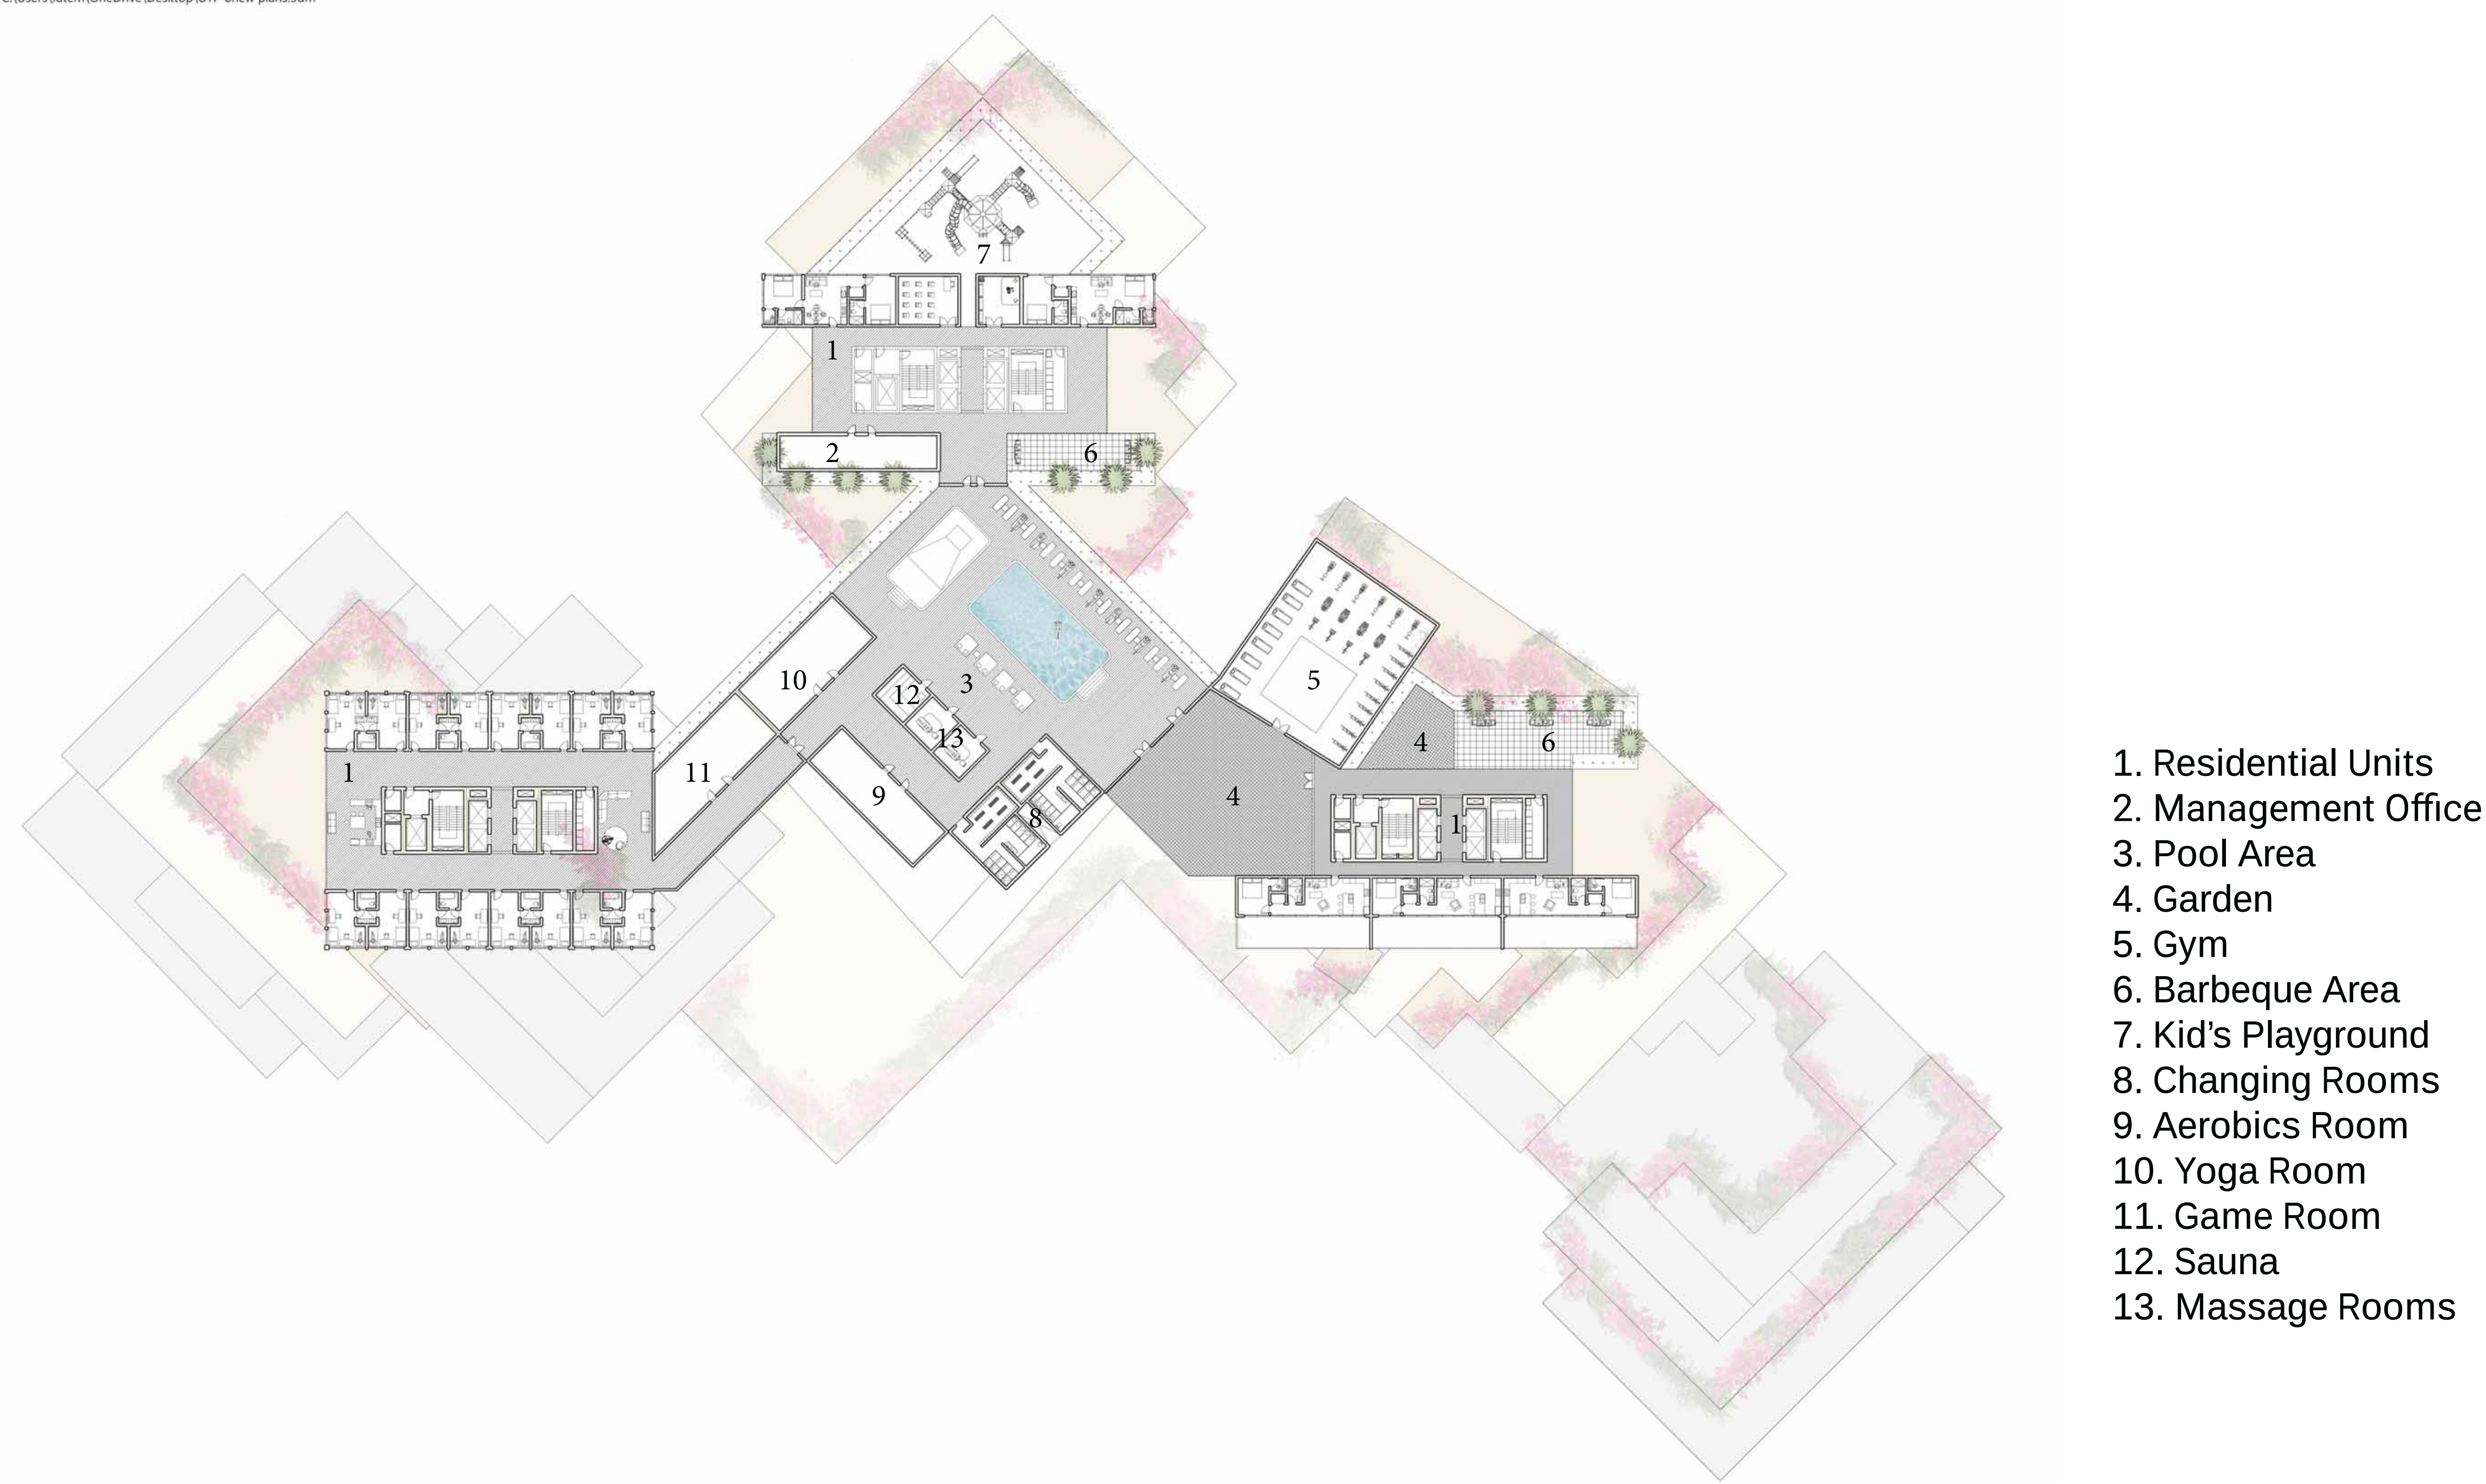

Steam Bath Area

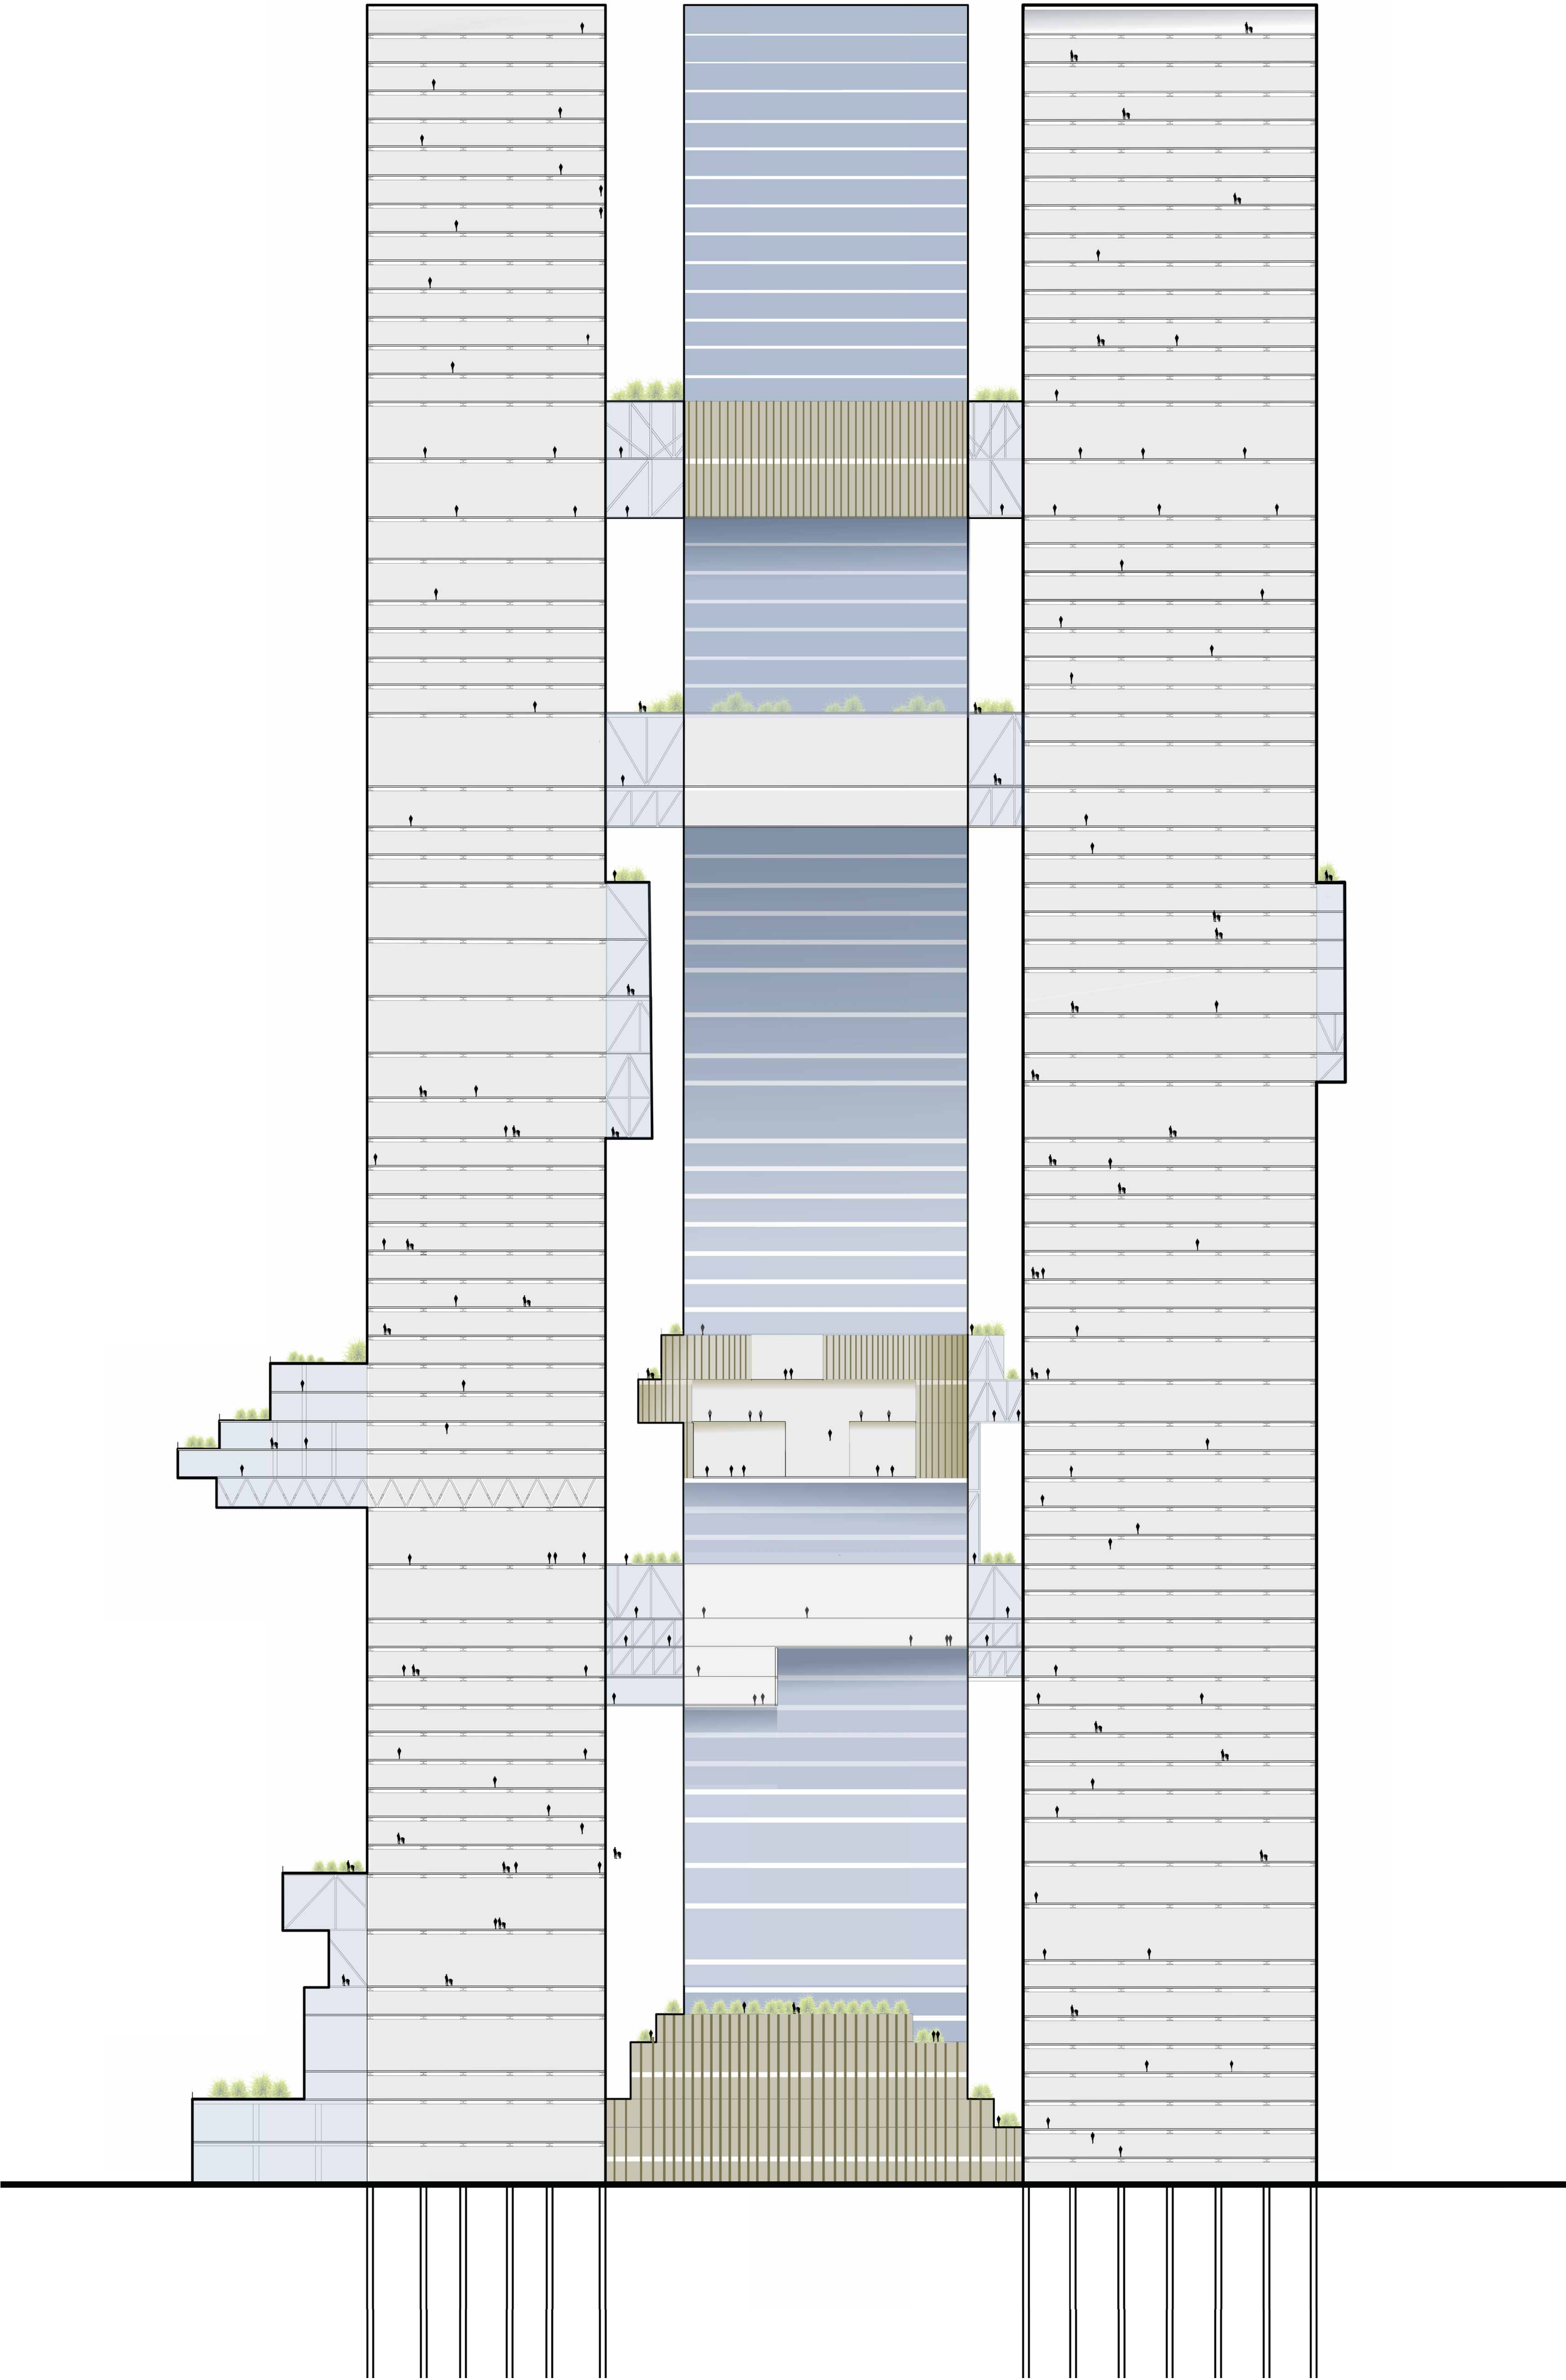

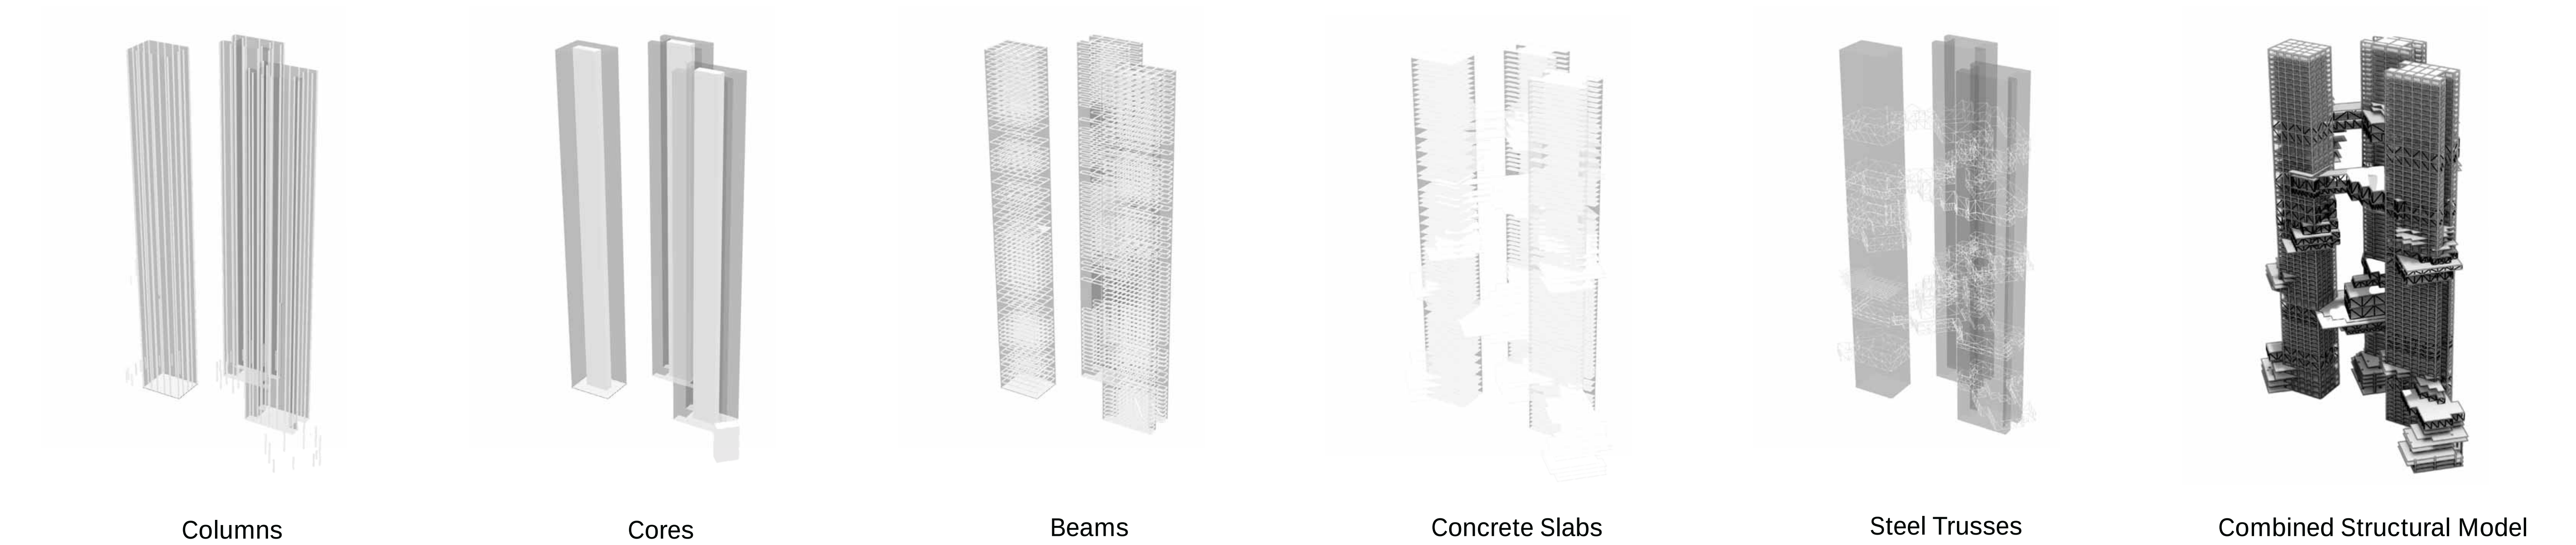

Family Residence

Residential Floor Plan

Structural Strategy

Section A-A

